

Managing Multiple Generations

Do you wonder why you can't find employees who are willing to work as hard as you?

"Why won't my employees take their thumbs off their cell phones when I am speaking to them?"

Increasingly, generational differences are causing conflict and frustration in many organizations. These differences — from how an employee views a dress code or work hours, to how work gets done and what a "full day" of work means — are becoming contentious. Each generation seems to be saying: "What are they thinking?" Our programs review generational differences and help participants develop an appreciation of how valuable such differences can be. It also identifies the areas where differences are most evident and suggests ways to deal with them.

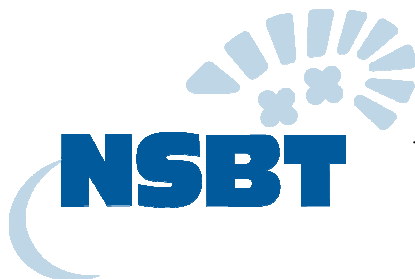

Session can be run in 1-2 hr formats:

- Identify the major influences on the four generational groups currently working, how these elements have shaped the generations, and how they have created noticeable differences
- Identify how issues such as work-life balance are thought of differently by the generations and yet have strong similarities
- Explore communication differences between the generations (including the varying roles technology plays) and how to deal with the differences
- Identify the behaviors that are causing work conflicts
- Develop practical techniques for working with the multiple generations to increase organizational effectiveness, productivity, and harmony

We also offer business consulting and coaching in this critical area!
